Taking Control

There are steps you can take to separate work from home

SET BOUNDARIES

Do this early on with employers, balance willingness to help with establishing personal boundaries for a clear work-life separation.

CLEAR WORKING HOURS

Agree and adhere to working hours with your Team and Manager.

MANAGE STRESS

Speak up when workload and expectations are excessive, resist repeated after-hours requests, and propose solutions for managing urgent work.

KEEP TO A ROUTINE

Fixed working times and a schedule will help your mind distinguish between work and personal time.

OPTIMISE YOUR WORKFLOW

Use digital tools to maximise your efficiency, such as RescueTime for Time Tracking and Sunsama for Time-Blocking.

CREATE A DEDICATED WORKSPACE

Physical separation will help minimise distractions, improve focus and productivity, and enable you to switch off at the end of the day.

SCHEDULE REGULAR BREAKS AND ACTIVITIES

Have regular breaks to recharge and interact with others. Use activities such as walks or gym sessions to replace commuting giving clear separation between work and home.

SWITCH OFF

When the working day is over, turn off notifications and avoid sending or checking emails, messages or phone calls.

Changing Habits

0

We often convince ourselves that massive success requires massive action.

0

But the effects of small changes have a compound impact over time.

0

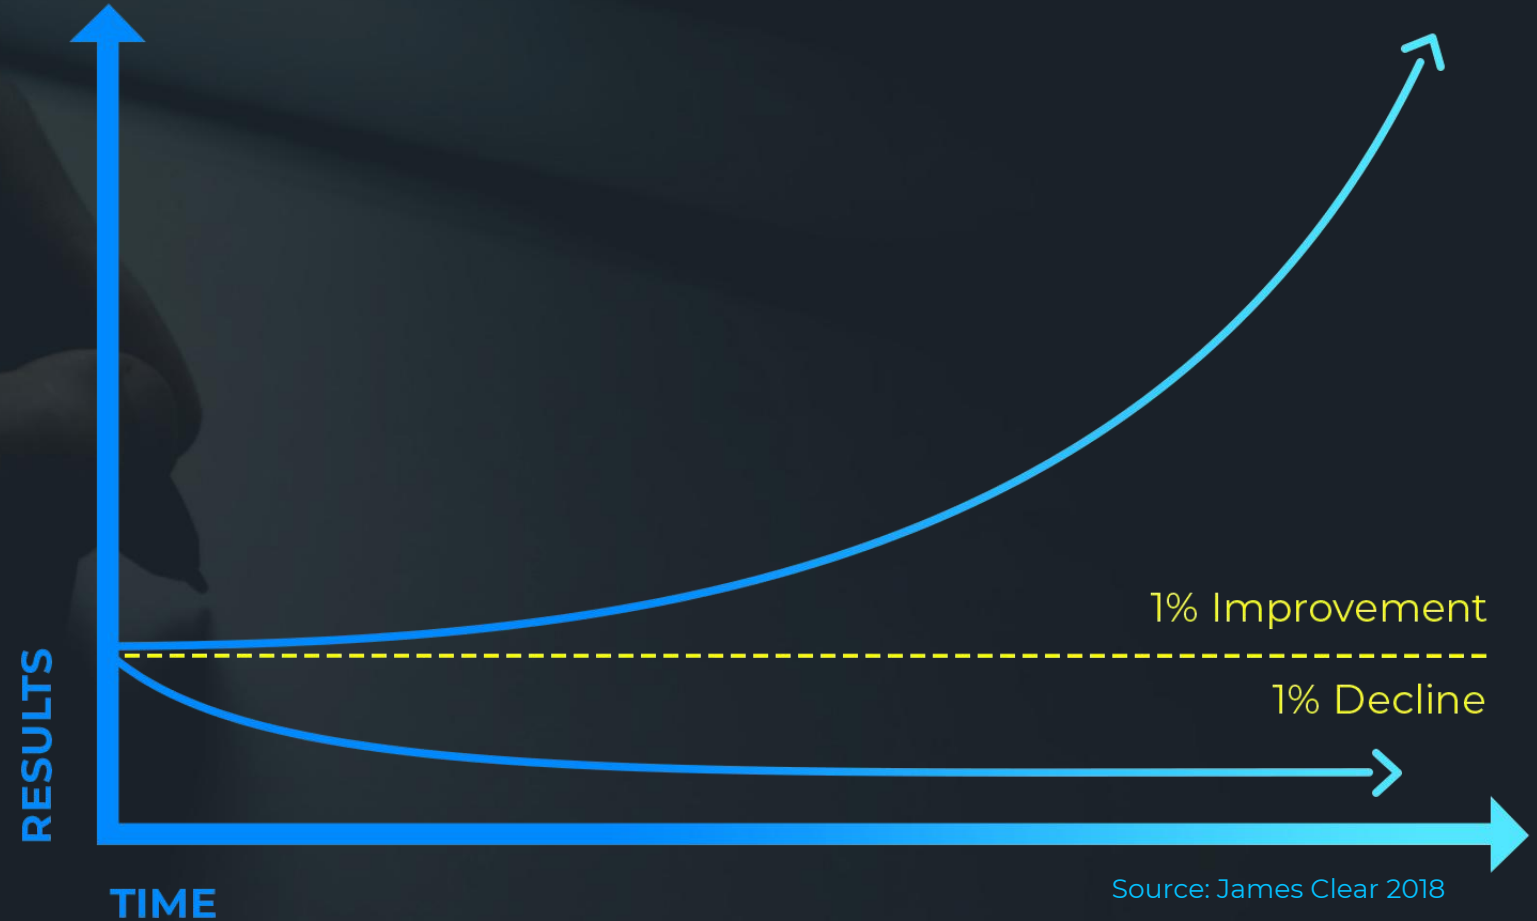

1% improvement daily compounds to 37% on a yearly basis.

0

Outcomes are a lagging measure of habits.

1% BETTER EVERY DAY

1% better every day for 1 year $1.01^{365} = 37.78$

Making Progress

THE PLATEAU OF LATENT POTENTIAL

- We often think that progress should be linear and we become frustrated when nothing much changes after several weeks.
- Core reason why many people give up as they try to build new habits.
- Need to continue to work and break through the plateau – The Plateau of Latent Potential.
- All big things come from small beginnings.
